IN former times the Fourth of July celebration was an exciting local event, whose highlight was a speech reviewing the nation's achievements. Many of the speeches appeared subsequently ("by request," their publishers were prone to put it) as pamphlets, and these collectively form a kind of literary category. They have similarities in style, purpose, and content, and a chronological orientation which lends itself to reflections of change. While most of them "viewed with pride," some dealt with issues of the day—politics or problems such as slavery, the Civil War, the evils of drink.

Recorded below are those Fourth of July orations, held by the Rutgers Special Collections Department, which pertain to New Jersey.* They are primarily pamphlets, although the compiler has included several which had been discovered fortuitously—no search was made for them—in periodicals or within other publications. While additional New Jersey Fourth of July orations exist, the group listed here is both substantial and representative.

A review of these ninety-five orations will show that many of their authors were local lawyers and politicians; only four doctors. Nearly a third were clergymen, usually Presbyterian. Inevitably there are seven by Episcopal bishop George Washington Doane, a dominating, vain individual who somehow managed to have scores of his minor writings and speeches committed to print.

Resident citizens' committees probably arranged a majority of the celebrations. Various organizations held or sponsored others. Conspicuous among them was the Society of the Cincinnati, and there were a few political groups—e.g., Friends of Peace (1814), the Whigs of Newark (1834), and Sons of Liberty (1861). The ceremonies often took place in churches, Presbyterian mostly, doubtless the only buildings with seating capacity for a proper crowd.

The subject matter of the orations has been commented upon. It may be added that, while patriotic and political essays predominated,

* The Department has also many such orations from other states.
there were several good local histories in the lot. These are the most enduringly useful of all, but singularly ill-suited to the needs of oratory. They were usually so long and so larded with minutiae as to have stupefied their respective audiences.
